Executive Summary

Progress

As of this year, the RootBeer project has reached a complete state, with consistent work being done since the beginning of the project. Starting from June of 2015, the repository has been updated continuously within an interval of 50 weeks. The most activity occurred from the start of the repository to week 150, where multiple authors provided updates and changes to the RootBeer library and application.

Contributions

Throughout the lifespan of the repository, most authors contributed for about a week to a year before dismissing from the project, as seen from the scatterplot above. This can be observed from weeks 50-150, as well as from weeks 225-275.

However, out of all authors, the original creators Scott Alexander-Brown and Matthew Rollings put in the most contributions. Rollings provided continual updates to multiple files over the course of the project, while Alexander-Brown was there at both the inception and week 300, where he helped to clean up and fix some last minute bugs with Rollings.
